I also have to say that importing DNG files is now more time consuming than with previous releases. And with none of the performance improvements or features I have seen coming with Lightroom 5.1, I can't help but to ask myself if there are more bugs to come. The last major thing that I wanted to say is that this new release of Photoshop CC seems to have a lot of bugs. I am not sure if it's just me or a known problem, but it seems that some really important features might be missing. This release, surprisingly, doesn't feature annotations at all. I don't know exactly when it was removed, but it shouldn't have happened in this release. I am not sure it's just me or if it's a known bug. Another big issue I've noted with this release is the result of the new CoreML developer program. This new CoreML promise Adobe has made has been taking a little longer than expected to appear in the final release. I don't really understand why CoreML is so convoluted and I'm not sure if Adobe will be able to overcome this. One of the less important aspects is that the new system will bring one of the older apps to camera RAW (CM10 Pro), Lightroom CC (CM10 Pro), and Photoshop (CM10 Pro). Lightroom CC and Photoshop both have ways to produce the same camera RAW files. It would also make sense for Photoshop to be able to produce CM10 Pro files, but this would require Adobe to do some re-architecting of the code. At the end of the day, I think CoreML is a promising feature, but Adobe has some work to do to make it more user-friendly. For those who want to check out the new tools, they can download them from Adobe CC's website (<http://support.cloud.adobe.com/en-us/workflow/OGDCUG.htm>) and the workflows are available in the Application Gallery for Lightroom CC and in the Publishing module for Adobe Photoshop.
