Lightroom is making a comeback after it previously gained a reputation for being a niche product for hobbyists and professional photographers. Adobe Lightroom is used by hundreds of thousands of professional photographers to organize, view, and edit their images. Lightroom is one of the top-rated photo editing applications for Canon and Nikon cameras. Lightroom 5 has a similarly friendly interface. Instead of jumping from the status bar on the left-hand side to the main workspace with most operations, you can live in the Status bar permanently. For those who don't know, Lightroom is a simple application that is easy to use. It is useful for all sorts of users: beginners, semi-advanced users, and advanced users. Compared to the previous version, however, the new version has many more options and explanations. The user interface has been improved as well. The new application has a modern look, but the user interface is still legible and very easy to use. I like the new feature where the application automatically applies tags to images within the main gallery (called the Library in previous versions), and I still prefer the High Contrast grid view to the New Look utility in recent versions. Lightroom was the right choice because of the wide array of image presets. Lightroom has real time image-adjustment options, and it is easier to use for beginners. Almost everyone who uses my programs agrees that Lightroom is incredibly easy to use and makes it very quick for them to adjust images. But you can still adjust every image in Photoshop (you don't have to import the image first), and some users do prefer its complex tools and the ability to work on multiple images at once.
